Essential for international higher education developmentVon Ein KundeRaby and Tarrow's book provides a needed challenge to the predominant idea that higher education development in developing countries must be conducted in traditional four-year colleges and universities. This edited volume contains chapters describing successful and innovative education development programs in Asian and African countries. Along with successful program models, critical perspectives about program failure are also provided. Readers seeking adaptable models will find many ideas to replicate in different settings. This book can also serve as a good reference to donor organizations interested in supporting relevant higher education initiatives at a lower cost than is typically the case with university-affiliated programs. Many project management organizations are described in detail along with their project development experiences. Of particular interest are the innovative programs initiated by and managed in association with US community colleges. As scholars of higher education know (although it may not be as evident to development policy professionals) community colleges have become leaders in program responsiveness and innovation. This volume reveals that community college innovation reaches beyond US borders via institutional cooperation in program development internationally.
